BEARS Like To SLEEP

PERHAPS you know that bears like to sleep a lot. In the wintertime it's especially nice. They curl up in their own woolly fur in a nice warm cave and just snooze and snooze. Well, Honey-lover bear, who liked to eat honey about as much as he liked to sleep, was settling down to slumber. He stretched and yawned and twitched his warm black nose and sniffed. OOPS! Bears' noses tell them lots of things you know, and Honey-lover's nose was telling him that someone was lurking outside his cave.

Honey-lover got to his feet and lumbered over to the cave entrance. He rolled the heavy stone aside and peered out into the snowy daylight. He sniffed again! Weasel! "Willy Weasel, I know you're there. What do you want?" SPLAT! A wet, splashing snowball landed right in Honey-lover's soft, furry ear. "Brrr," he said, shaking his head and batting at his cold ear. Then he squinted his eyes and looked around trying to catch sight of Willy Weasel.

Now there's a very interesting thing about weasels. In the warm weather, they are small, sleek, brown animals, always into some sort of trouble and mischief. But in the winter, when the snow is on the ground, their fur changes to a lovely, glistening white, so white that you can hardly see them against the snow on the ground. And at the same time, they change their name from weasel to ermine. But they don't stop being troublesome and that's just what Willie Weasel-Ermine was doing this day.

"Ha, ha, ha," laughed Willy, and as Honey-lover turned towards the sound of Willy's laughter, he got another snowball, BAM, right in the face. "I know you bears are trying to hibernate," shouted Willy. (Hibernate is the word meaning long, winter's nap). "And," continued Willy, "Keeping you awake is my project for this winter." And he laughed again. "Oh, posh," said Honey-lover, getting a little annoyed. "I'm sleepy, Willy. Please go away." And he turned and went back into his cave, rolling the rock into place as he went.

Honey-lover was snoozing happily, having wonderful honey dreams, when Willy finally managed to slide the big stone away from the cave entrance in the snow. Then he struggled and strained to roll a great big snow ball into the cave. When he got it right up next to Honey-lover's fur, Honey-lover started to shiver and shake in his sleep. Willy suppressed a chuckle and slipped away, leaving the cave entrance wide open for the wind and snow to blow in. Well, sir, Honey-lover had a terrible time waking up. He dreamed he had fallen into a huge icy lake and it had frozen all around him. Finally he shook himself awake with a roar and a shiver. He could hear Willy laughing wickedly as he trotted away through the snowy woods.

It took Honey-lover no time at all to jump to his feet and take off. He couldn't see Willy because he was so white, but his trusty nose told him which direction Willy was going and he thundered along after him. Willy thought this was great fun. "Ha, ha . . ." he shouted, "I told you I'd keep you awake, you silly, sleepy bear." Honey-lover was so angry he just growled as he rumbled along. Suddenly a new smell smacked him right in the nose . . . a MAN! He stopped short. "Willy, Willy Weasel," he called. "Come back, there's danger ahead." But Willy just laughed. "You can't catch me that way, silly bear." Then Honey-lover heard a loud CRACK and Willy's shout of terror. "Ycow! I'm trapped. Honey-lover, help!"

Honey-lover hurried as fast as he could, he knew that ermine traps were all through the forest because their fur is extra valuable in the wintertime. He knew he'd have to hurry too, because the man smell was still nearby, which meant the trapper might come back and check his trap. Willy's leg was caught tight in the strong trap. "Please help me," he pleaded. "I'm sorry I woke you up, Honey-lover." Honey-lover was already busy using his strong teeth to try and release the trap. Then his nose twitched, the man smell was getting stronger, the trapper was returning. Willy knew it, too. "Please don't stop, please," he cried again. Very slowly the trap released enough for Willy to wiggle out. He dashed away immediately. But before Honey-lover could get away the trap clapped tight on his nose. Oh, woe! And the trapper was coming closer all the time. Then he heard Willy's chatter. "Don't worry, I'll let the trapper see me and while he's chasing me, you work to get free." And sure enough, Honey-lover heard the trapper shout, "An ermine, Wow!" And then he heard the trapper getting further and further away as he chased Willy. Honey-lover worked all that day and part of the night getting free and then he finally stumbled back into his cave, twice as tired as ever before. He had just snuggled down to resume his sleep when he sniffed Willy again. Willy squeezed in past the rock at the cave entrance and fell exhausted, next to Honey-lover. "Move over, friend," he panted. "This is one ermine that's gonna hibernate, too." And the two forest creatures, one furry brown bear and one small, white ermine fell sound asleep.
